Adobe Photoshop Pro is a popular software package that is used to edit photos and other image files. As mentioned, this is a huge program with a lot of features. It is very easy to use and perfect for beginners. The program also has a couple of quirks that make it a bit less comforting to use, but not enough to deter you.

Photoshop has continued to improve with a more streamlined UI, thanks to a new row of icons at the top, alongside the familiar panels and toolbars. You might also see a smoother menu system, with more icons that make accessing your editing options faster. Phototouch is a feature that's been rumored for a while now but is now quite a bit more refined in this edition. With the first iteration, you could apply any editing you wanted to a photo—using Photoshop alone—but that also came with a lot of potential downsides. This one should be much better. When you open a phototouch file, it's automatically recognized and stored in the layers of the active document. Then you can apply Editor tweaks in tandem with Lightroom, Bridge, Photoshop, or any UI that's set up to work with the layer. No matter what type of work you need to accomplish, Photoshop can do it. The company itself refers to the upgrade as the next step in its evolution towards Creative Cloud, but it remains a standalone suite. The changes in Photoshop 2020 are not as dramatic as the video-to-video transition from CS6. It shares a lot of the same features as CS6, while introducing two new color-managed file types and a new interface. Many of the major functional changes can be found by comparing this year's shift. Few minor features have been added for the sake of UI consistency, however. The latest update is a refocus against the building blocks of today's image design. This is a big part of what makes this release so exciting.

Maybe I should just make some content of my own... I just don't know what to do. I really like the blog, but there's so much out there I can't become half-baked content creator. So, here goes: The bulletproof process I wrote about in my first blog post is still surprisingly effective for me. Especially when I'm writing for the web. But a whole new challenge has presented itself, and it's about something so abstract and involved that it pushed even faster out of my comfort zone than using the bulletproof process itself. To some extent, I think I relaxed into the process just because I was pretty good at it. Whatever. Now I need a new process. How do you find your new process? Lately I've been following a few heavily promoted blogging tools like StoryBird and Storypoint, and I'm using them to write out each idea I have, and then I'll go back and refine them too. I've also been playing around with monday.com, which is a web-based version of my bulletproof "planner and notebook" process, (and it's pretty rad in its own right).
