The mechanisms of the steroidogenic actions of ethanol on the monkey corpus luteum were studied. Intraluteal injections of ethanol in vivo resulted in a dose-related increase in progesterone output into the luteal artery. A 50-mg i.v. injection of ethanol was used, and the dose was associated with a mean elevation of progesterone levels above the basal values by 90 min. Ethanol did not stimulate testosterone secretion from the monkey corpus luteum. The study does not support the concept that ethanol may act on a previously unrecognized receptor-mediated mechanism to stimulate progesterone secretion. However, the study also showed that the steroidogenic effects of ethanol on the corpus luteum of the monkey were similar to those described for the ovary. [A case of Hb Deijiglai with schizocytosis and severe macrocytic anemia]. A case of a 16 years old girl with schizocytosis and macrocytic anemia is presented. A routine complete blood count showed microcytic, hypochromic and macrocytic anemia. Serum iron was also low, but in a high proportion of unsaturated iron binding capacity. Hereditary hemolytic anemia with schizocytosis (Hb Deijiglai) was suspected. The diagnosis of Hb Deijiglai with macrocytic anemia was confirmed by electrophoresis. Also, in the peripheral blood there were schizocytes which were observed in a differential blood count and in a Giemsa staining of blood smears. The patient was given transfusion of blood in an interval of 2-3 weeks and this successfully corrected the anemia. She has never developed any symptoms related to the erythrocyte abnormalities.
